NO girls allowed" was the warning which went with invitations to a young Buddy Koller's birthday party which took place Thursday afternoon.

The affair was strictly a "stag" affair, even Buddy's little sister, Rosemary, being banished for the afternoon. The youngsters who attended were Jack Burr, Lawrence Burr, Billy Gordon, Joseph Dodge, Bobby Fraser, Billy Wiig, Fred Reimer, Billy Sheehan and Bobby Sheehan.

At the close of the afternoon, the guests gathered in the dining room where a huge birthday cake formed the center of attraction. Places were marked with small birthday "calling cards," as Buddy terms them.

An interesting Fourth of July celebration took place Monday in far away Algiers, Africa, when Edward Dow, American consul, and Mrs. Dow entertained at a lawn party for the American colony.

The Dow home, a picturesque old villa set in the midst of a lovely garden filled with flowers and shrubbery, is situated on a hill overlooking the Mediterranean.

Mr. Dow is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles N. Dow of this city.

HOLDING A HUSBAND

Adela Garrison's New Phase of "Revelations of a Wife"

The Curiously Humble Question Dicky Asked Madge.

As Lillian's cold checks brushed my face I shuddered apprehensively. Had the joy of knowing that her small daughter would be restored to her stilled her weakened heart?

I searched her unconscious face wildly, while my arms held her firmly, though I knew Dr. Pettit still retained the firm grasp which he had given her arm when he announced the result of the radiograph.

"Loosen your hold, Mrs. Graham," The physician's authoritative voice sounded in my ears. "That's right, Miss Jones," to the tall nurse who had come to my side at Lillian's swooning.

They lifted her easily between them, laid her flat and administered the usual remedies for fainting. But it was an obstinate swoon, and it was several minutes before Lillian's great eyes opened.

"Marion!" The word came from her lips faintly, then she attempted to rise.

"Oh! Is it true?" she gasped. "Is she all right? Let me go to her."

Dr. Pettit put her back with an authoritative hand.

"She will be all right, and there is nothing you can do for her until she awakens of herself," he said firmly.

"But if you do not obey orders strictly now you will be unable to care for her when she does awaken."

The threat affected Lillian as nothing else could have done.

"I will do whatever you say," she said meekly.

"Good!" Dr. Pettit's voice was approving, reassuring. "Miss Jones,

"I bent over Lillian longingly, loath to leave her, though my heart was racing toward my own little chap. Suppose, after all, there was some permanent injury to his arm—all the hysterical imaginings of anxious motherhood began to have their way with me.

"Dear girl!" Lillian's voice was but a whisper. "I don't know what I should have done without you. And I know—somehow everything will be all right with your baby. God bless you, dear."

I went to my little son with her benediction upon me, and clung to it, as Dicky and I carried our little chap to the radiograph room, fearing last the noise of the machine and the unfamiliar surroundings would frighten him.

But Junior bore himself like a little major. At the first sound of the machine he broke into a delightful gurgle.

A Great Relief. "Dakkum, Dooner!" he called. "Dakkum, Dooner!" Vere Tatie, Dooner vants Tatie.

"The blessed little rascal!" Dicky whispered to me, his voice shaken with relief.

Dr. Pettit looked inquiringly at us and I hastened to explain, knowing that no slightest detail affecting one of his patients was ever allowed to escape his notice, no matter how trivial it might sound.

"Junior thinks it's the vacuum cleaner," I explained.

"He was always perfectly fascinated when Katie used it, and she often let him trot beside her with his hands upon the handle."

My voice faltered at the sudden panic-stricken thought that came to me—perhaps one of those little hands—

Dr. Pettit spoke with quick, cheery firmness. "He'll be running it again in no time. There, that's all."

So great was my confidence in him that I felt no greater relief a few minutes at his announcement that Junior's arm was simply sprained, and would be all right, than I did at this offhand assurance.

"Will we have to stay at the hospital?" Dicky demanded.

"Not unless his mother wishes him with her," Dr. Pettit said gravely.

"Of course, we are far from being out of the woods with Marion yet, although the chances are in favor of her speedy recovery. But her mother's heart is far from being satisfactory, and I would like Mrs. Graham to remain near Mrs. Underwood, at least until Marion recovers consciousness."

"What do you think, Madge?" Dicky's tone was curiously humble, and I knew that the danger to Lillian had shocked him out of his usual hostile attitude to Dr. Pettit.

I am glad to think it was only for an instant that I hesitated. My heart yearned to be with my ailing little lad, and to care for him in his convalescence. But with the knowledge that I would not have had him at all if it had not been for Lillian's daughter, I spoke steadily:

"He does not need me, and Lillian does. Have mother get all the directions from Dr. Pettit as to his care, and then take him home. And be careful of him."
