Holding a Husband

Adele Garrison's New Phase of "Revelations of a Wife"

The Parting Shot Dr. Pettit Fired at Dicky. Ma-ma! Ma-ma-tum! Ma-ma tate

Dooner. This was the joyful little cry which greeted my ears as I entered our siting room at the Ticer farmhouse, followed closely by Dr. Pettit.
Dicky, who had been sitting by the window with Junior in his arms, rose quickly, in evident astonishment at my return from the hospital. I vouchsafed no explanation at first, simply tore loose my hat and coat, throwing them on the nearest chair in defiance of my usually careful habits, and gathered my little lad into my arms, trying to crowd into minute all the petting I had been onging to give him ever since the With a little sigh of contentment e snuggled his head into the hollow, of my shoulder, for all the world like a kitten nosing its way under sheltering elbow, then his muffled voice sounded pleadingly:

"Ma-ma sin' 'Dooner Boy."

"In a little while, darling, Mother can't sing just now. Cuddle down, and mother will rock you." "Sin' 'Dooner Boy' pretty soon," he persisted. "Yes, very soon, if you're a good boy and keep quiet."

"Dooner is dood boy," he said. "Yes, I know you are," and with this assurance he kept quiet while I gave my attention to what the others were saying.

Dicky evidently had asked at once for news of Marion, and his mother and my father were listening attentively to the account Dr. Pettit was giving. I did not wish to sing for to the approximate location of scenes in Barthelmess' story "Tol'ble David." Mr. King, a native of the district, knows exactly where to take ing voice, and the song for which he mond will be with Lasky and Kath- timate friends as Lillian and the Durkees. But Junior never tired of it, demanding it especially if he were ill or downhearted over some baby tragedy like the breaking of a favorite toy.

An Apprehension. I had an especial reason for not singing it before Dr. Pettit. Once, the summer before, he had heard me humming it to Junior, and had murmured something especially saccha-rine about it. I feared that in the egregrious vanity he appeared to have developed he might think that I was attempting to recall to his memory his former banality of sentiment. I was exceedingly thankful that Junior had been so docile about it. "Then you think she is out of danger?" Mother Graham asked, after the physician had answered a. number of excited questions con-round my heart. The physician's words told me nothing that I had not suspected before, but to have my fears thus professionally con-firmed, terrified me. Thankful, indeed, was I that Robert Savarin was on his way to my friend's side. I set my lips tightly in the grim determin-ation to aid him in his struggle to break down Lillian's quixotic attitude toward freedom from the hateful bonds which shackled her, with happiness at the end. But Dicky was plainly startled. "What do you mean?" he asked brusquely. A Hasty Exit. "Exactly what I said," the physician replied stiffly, and I was reminded involuntarily of two shorttempered mastiffs, warily glowering and growling at each other. "I would not answer for the effect on her of a serious shock such as Marion's death would be." I clasped my own child closer with the feeling that I would not wish Lillian to live if Marion were taken from her. I knew only too well that not even my husband would be sufficient to make me desire life if my little lad were no longer in the world. Dr. Pettit rose abruptly-I knew that Dicky's roughness of mannes had offended his dignity - and crossed the room to me. "If you will let me see the arm."
