Burns Finishes Conspiracy Tale In Ball Trial

Says Players Double-Crossed Gamblers on Third-Day Game-Makes Strong Impression.

Chicago, July 20 .- Bill Burns, the state's chief strength in the base ball trial, today finished his story of how he and others conspired with eight Chicago White Sox players for them to throw the 1919 world series to Cincinnati. The admitted accomplice in the alleged sell-out then withstood three hours of nerve-racking cross-examination by two defense attorneys in which he fought a give and take battle, never weakening in the essential facts of his story, although several times badly confused on incidental details.

At the end of his 12th hour on the stand, the witness appeared ex-hausted. His body was limp in the witness stand, his eyes were half closed, but his head was held back and his answers still came clearly.

The impression made by Burns as a witness despite loopholes found in his testimony by the defense might be seen in the remark of a defense attorney at the end of the day that "If that man's story is not proven false we may as well consider our case lost. We believe we can prove some parts of his story absolutely

After finishing his story of Cincinnati conference between himself Abe Attell and Bennett, whom he identified yesterday was David Zelser of Des Moines, Ia., a defendant, Burns told of further meeting in Chicago, of how the players double-crossed the alleged "Fixers" by winning the third game when they were not paid after the first two, and of how he agreed with Ban Johnson, president of the American league, and John Tyrrell, assistant state's attorney, to come to Chicago that he was paid other than his ex- crown. penses for his testimony or that he was promised any reward.
