HOLDING A HUSBAND

Adelle Garrison's New Phase of "Revelations of a Wife"

How Miss Jones GuesSED Lillian's Perplexity.

"Hello! Hello!" Through the door of the telephone booth in the drug store at Bridgehampton I could see Dicky pressing the receiver up and down as he reiterated his impatient call. And when he finally emitted an impatient, "What's that?" and put the receiver on its hook with a bang. I was not surprised to hear him say as he came breathless and perspiring out of the booth: "They don't answer! Now, what's to be done?"

"I suppose they've all gone into town," I suggested. "You know Mrs. Durkee loves nothing better than a trip into New York, no matter what the thermometer is, and she's probably taken Edith and Lella with her."

"Well, I wish she'd have been a little less of a salamander today!" Dicky declared. "How the dickens are we going to find out anything about what Jim and Katie meant?"

"We can't, that's all," I returned philosophically. "We will have to meet all three trains tomorrow, so as to be sure not to miss them. Can you imagine Katie if they landed out here and she didn't see a familiar face at the train?"

"Oh! I imagine Jim would take care of her hysteria and the situation all right," Dicky returned carelessly. "But!" I retorted, snapping my fingers. "According to Katie's ideas, Jim is about as much use in an emergency as a 3-days-old kitten would be. Of course, it's an unjust view, but you know Katie."

"Yes," Dicky drawled provokingly, "also her charming mistress. Wonder where Katie got her philosophy on the proper place of husbands in this mundane sphere? Not from her early training in Poland, I'll bet two ginger cookies."

His tone pointed his meaning unmistakably, and while his ironic mood was unmistakably an innocuous and merry one, yet there was that in his inflection which made me conscious of an undercurrent of seriousness, and rendered me distinctly uncomfortable.

"We had reached the street with the end of Dicky's sentence, and I was wondering how best to answer him, when the consciousness of a duty undone freed me from the necessity of referring to his gibe at all."

"Oh, I must telephone the hospital!" I said hurriedly. "And what do you think? Don't you think I can wait till tomorrow afternoon to go over there? That first train will be in by that time, and I shall be so fearfully busy before then."

Dicky laughed down at me quizzically. "Do you think, don't you think," he repeated. "What's the matter with the original shakness on dictation this morning? It can't be she's flustered!"

I turned away abruptly that Dicky might not suspect how near the tears were to my eyes. But he next instant he was at my side, laying a compelling but unobtrusive finger on my arm.

"Go ahead, boil me in oil, I dare you to. I'll call the cop," he whispered, and, of course, I laughed, my worried irritation vanishing at once.

Common Sense

By J. J. MUNDY.

Hot Weather and Work.

Progressive and successful employers are learning that it is a good thing for their employes to have sufficient time at the end of the day for a play spell. It is more and more recognized that the worth-while employe is entitled to some right sort of amusement, something affording out-of-doors exercise and plenty of fresh air, making them more fit for their work-intensive, and more pep generally being shown as the result of a "work and play" combination.

The languid employe, the one who yawns and complains about the heat and spends more time thinking about his discomfiture than he does about his work, is not a profitable employe. It must be expected that some discomfiture is to be experienced in the round of daily duties, especially in hot weather. But all summers are alike in this respect, so why complain about it? Every working person has disagreeable things to do according to his job. The one who is looking for a soft snap is not much good anyway. Expect obstacles and unpleasant things and have the spirit to overcome them and enjoy it, or you will never ride out of the circle of common worker. Every employer should try to make conditions as comfortable as possible. Copyright, 1921, International Feature Service, Inc.
