The Fate of Miss 1921

Will Miss 1921 survive the siege of critics and reformers. From a prominent athletic club comes the demand that she lay aside her cigarette; from the church comes the edict that she lengthen her skirt; from the little town of Zion comes the law that she must wear no flimsy waists, no low necks, no short sleeves, and, latest of all, from an insurance company comes the news that the job is taboo.

And much of it is true. Miss 1921 is a free and easy, scantily clad, snappy little bit of humanity, but—let any one try to pull the wool over her eyes or attempt to put anything over on her and he will discover that she has a backbone that would do credit to an Amazon.

Could any man kiss Miss 1921 unless she wanted to be kissed? Let him try it if he's doubtful. Could he lead her down the fowery path of destruction without her knowing it? She can count the pitfalls and sidestep them like a thoroughbred. If she's saucy she's also wise. Education and the free mingling in the affairs of the world have taught her how to take care of herself, given her an opportunity to become economically independent and created for her a spirit of comradeship with the opposite sex that allows her companionship, if not as flattering, much more sensible and intelligent than that of the old school when she was placed on a pedestal.

If the criers-down of Miss 1921 would only turn back to consideration of Mistress 76 perhaps they would not be quite so fearful of the fate of womankind.

Drawn Birds. Housewives are often in a quandary to know whether it is a better plan to have their poultry drawn or not, because of the keeping quality of the birds.

In elaborate experiments conducted by the United States Department of Agriculture it has been found that undrawn birds spoil less quickly, and partly drawn ones less quickly, than the fully drawn ones from which not only the viscera, but also the heads and feet, have been removed.

Love Stories of Today End in Tragedy

By BEATRICE FAIRFAX.

Today's love story doesn't end: "And so they were married and lived happily ever after."

Marriage begins the story—a-la-1921. And two many of the stories that begin with romance, love, courtship, marriage—end sordidly or tragically or in boredom—or the divorce courts.

No one can turn on his feelings as if they were controlled by a shiny silver spicket.

There are things which compel human emotions—like things which repel them. Marriage is not a de luxe simple, anybody-can-work-it job. It's one of the hardest propositions in the game of living.

To feed romance there's mystery—the unknown—the chase. But marriage tears down most of the veils of mystery and does away with the need of pursuit. And so most "marrieds" sit back in cushioned ease, fold their hands over expanding figures, take to slippers and mental slouchiness and then wonder why the charm of courtship days seems gone forever.

Quite a while ago the "lady vamp" came sailing along insouciant horizons. She was ready to take the place of any lazy, off-the-job wife who was permitting a worth-while man to get restive and to feel an interest in the idea of green fields and pastures new. And now we have the consolatory gentleman who's ready to put a little romance into the humdrum existence of the bored wife whose husband insists on being a provider and not a stimulant.

Some marriages go on the rocks because of cruelty or incompatibility. But a great many more are shipwrecked because there's no one around with enough common sense to realize that there never was a ship yet that could be trusted to sail without steering.

Laziness, selfishness and stupidity ought to be given as the cause of a large percentage of our divorces.

Marriage is a contract, a business partnership and an affair of the emotions all in one. But if either partner shirks and loses interest, how long would the other permit a regular business contract to stand? And how long would any business partner permit the other to demand an account of all his time, to insist on knowing with whom he had lunch and to claim that he'd been abused if his partner happened to play billiards with another chap in the same line of trade?

Husbands and wives don't own each other. No one can "possess" the soul of another. We're all free and instinctively we claim our right to be individuals. That's all right and fine enough as long as our freedom isn't based on stealing from any one else's store of freedom or crowding other folks so we may swing our own tails.

The love triangle wouldn't happen along so often in our history if the love-duet were played with any sense of harmony.

The things which attracted before marriage are likely to prove interesting after marriage. Neatness, animation, interest, friendly responsiveness to a mood, a sense of partnership, an eager desire to please, understanding, loyalty, unquestioning faith—all these are just as important as love and kisses. Emotion may not stand up under a rival emotion that is newer, fresher, more stimulating and made alluring by a sense of uncertainty and the charm of the forbidden. But loyalty and faith and a deepening sense of gratitude will.

Marriage is a business—the most important business in the world. Home, family, life itself are based on the marriage system. Why not bring more efficiency to bear on the subject?
