Seen in Shops.

A navy blue dress is braided in varnished black straw and has quaint organdie collar and cuffs.

Blouses of white crepe de chine have heavy embroidery in colored silk, usually dark blue or henna.

Circular capes of velvet, satin and broadcloth, trimmed with wide bands of fur, are featured for fall.

A henna tinted straw hat has a crown of henna satin and is trimmed smartly with henna colored feathers.

For afternoon models, taffeta lace, soft silken tissues, charmeuse, morocain, georgette and crepe are used.

A heavy black and white tassel hangs from the collar at the back of a long loose coat. A large black lace hat is worn with it.

Organdies, of course, are continuing to hold their own. The simpler they are, if the non-professional handles them, the better they look. So select a simple pattern to follow, and depend on the charm of color and sheen of finish for your effect. It will be good.

Dark muslins dotted with white are particularly suggestive of freshness and coolness, and they are most satisfactory things to make oneself. Try making one with a scalloped skirt bound with a narrow white bias fold with scalloped sleeves bound in the same way and with a neckline finished just with a little white muslin collar.

The overblouse of cotton crepe or other cotton material is still in good style. One interesting way to make these blouses is to put applied flowers or fruit cut from colored crepe of different colors on a background of white, blue or tan. Gray, too, may be made the background color, if gray is becoming. There is always the chance that gray is not becoming, and unless it is shouldn't be used.

What's What

By HELEN DECIE

If selfishness is the foundation, certainly patience is the cornerstone of courtesy. Wellbred men and women are patient with the weaknesses of age and with the foibles of youth. They have developed the faculty of looking backward to their own days of rash heedlessness and of looking forward to their own time of unreasoning senility, and this double vision restrains them from the unkindness of "natural impatience."

Whether rich or poor, the cultivator of patience unconsciously cultivates manners which might be envied by princes. To the ancient Brahmins, famed for their exquisite and sincere courtesy, we are indebted for the maxim, "Always meet petulance with gentleness and petulance with kindness." Young people who must share in the care of invalids or "peculiar" old people have to endure many petty trials, but the process of self-conquest is admirable discipline for strengthening the character and for softening, or, as the old phrase has it, for "gentling" the manners.

A Shop of Rare Jewels

At the top of the marble stairway in the lobby of the Woodmen of the World Building, where the light from the hall is softened by dull stained glass, is to be found an art jewel shop.

For many years Mr. Edholm has dreamed of a shop wherein could be rendered an art jewel service, where a choice collection of artistic pieces might be offered to lovers of the beautiful art drawings prepared for the connoisseur and submitted together with rare stones of unusual beauty.

The dream has come true—a shop where beautiful jewels are shown in leisurely quiet and seclusion particularly pleasing to sensitive beauty lovers.
