What Grace Drapes Wrote to

Madge. I opened Grace Draper's answer to my letter with hands that I kept from shaking only by putting forth all my will power. Had she accepted or refused the offer I had made her on Dicky's account? And what would be my own reaction to either decision on her part? At the mo-ment so conflicting were the emetions which swept me that I had no answer for my own last query.

Dicky strolled up behind me lazily and looked over my shoulder as read. His pose of indolent, casual interest was too perfect, too studied a thing to deceive me. I knew that his nerves were as tense as mine over this communication. It opened abruptly, with no date line or salutation, even as had the other letter, the plea for pardon, which she had sent to me when I was in the south. I wondered anew the reason for this, whether underneath her proffered repentance there was not a bitterness which would Located north. Offered at less than you can build the house for.
