Lumber raits bring starving Tartars south on the Volga to this point where they meet river barges laden with refugees from as far south as Astrakham. Different in languages, customs habits, religion and garb, they find a common denominator in hunger, disease, rags and filth. They come begging or they seek shipment to places where there is food. They are helpless and the government they appeal to admits its helplessness to fill their needs. And thus they sit and wait and pray to their different gods and die while the gongs and bells in the gilded church domes deliver a seemingly barbarous clamor
