Romance in Origin Of Superstitions

By IRVING KING. Geraniums.

There is a rather common belief in the rural districts of the United States that snakes will not go where geraniums are growing and that ger-aniums growing in a window-box "Good work, Mrs. Graham," Mr. aniums growing in a window-box will prevent flies from entering the window. This superstition attaches to the plants cultivated in gardens and as house-plants, which are not geraniums at all, but belong to the genus pelargonium of South Africa. The magical qualities of this plant were transferred to it along with the name from the true geranium; the word geranium being a Greek word meaning crane's bill, a name given to the true geranium because of the long projecting beek of the seed capsule. In fact crane's bill is the common name for the true geramum.

Now the crane was for long ages a bird of mystery. At a certain season the crane disappeared and at a certain season he reappeared, always flying in a V shape. This mystery as to the crane's place and manner of breeding, and the weird dances they indulge in at the time of their lovemaking, caused a wealth of mythology and folk-lore to grow up around them. It was not until 1853 that it was discovered that the crane sought the shores of the Arctic sea to lay its eggs and rear its young. Among the ancients there was a crane the peculiar form of the seed capsule of the geranium caused it to be looked upon with suspicion, and to the plant were assigned some of the mystic attributes which pertained antagonistic to snakes and flies. When the pelargonium came to be called in popular parlance geranium -crane's bill-the superstition went with the name. This is a curious example of a superstition surviving by means of a name, though the name is now given to an entirely lifferent object from that by means of which the superstition had birth. My Marriage Problems

'Revelations of a Wife" (Copyright, 1971, by Newspayer Feature Service, 100)

The Way the Wounded Trooper Was Brought to the Inn.

I had not waited for Dicky's call o Bess Dean. As I answered his query concerning my whereabouts I slipped past him to the gate, at the lock of which Ted was fumbling. I knew that the lad's brains and eyes were not upon the keys, but upon Bess Dean, whose head was peering from the car. With an impatient little exclama tion, and—I am airaid, an exceeding-ly school ma'amish attitude—I snatched the keys from his hand, scruntinized them and the lock, and in another instant fitted the right one, unlocked the gate, and swung it open. Making sure that it would not swing back, I ran toward the car, sprang into the driver's seat, and inserted the switch key. I had seen that by backing the car into the open road the task of lifting the unconscious wounded trooper into Sim Flinders, who has been saying the car would be made much easier. She obeyed him instantly, and was out in the road with both tonneau doors sounded as I unlocked the gate. She open as I climbed into the car. She Fletcher Henstep has two looking also, has been trained to meet emergencies without flinching, and I guessed that she was even more willing than I to sink the question of her wanderings with Dicky for the last hour or two, beneath the stress of the coming battle for the life of the wounded man.

"Everything's out of the tonneau," she said tersely. "What can I do?"
"Watch at the back, there," I responded, "for a chance car and the ditch on the other side. Call 'Stop' if I'm not going right."

I had started the car as I spoke and was beginning the backing. She stepped to the rear, and by the time the stretcher and its bearers reached

"Which way?" I asked laconically, "Straight ahead. Keep on this state road for about a mile. There's only one cross-road, and that isn't macadam, so you don't need to bother about corners. I'll tell you when to stop." Bess Dean had climbed to the seat beside me, but for once in her life she had no comment, no query. That he was distinctly the village cut-up, and that this was one of his sure-fire laughter-provoking tricks, I suessed from the conscious air with which he did it, and the giggle which greeted his action. I had time to notice this through the open windows as one would a This term originated in 1802. The promise of the topaz will be fulfilled today for those whose birth anniversary this is. This promise embraces all good fortune, as well as protection from harm, particularly the harm which arises from evil acquaintances. It was believed by the ancients that those who were a topaz led singularly pleasant and untroubled lives. Yellow is a fortunate color today.

To wear it is believed to bring happiness in love.
