

Order to Compel Vaccination in City Is Modified

Will Be Required Only of Persons or Other Public Places Who Have Been Exposed to Smallpox.

City Health Commissioner Dr. A. S. Pinto yesterday withdrew his order of Monday for compulsory vaccination of public school children and employees of business firms or institutions where people congregate.

There is no smallpox epidemic in Omaha, only four light cases having been reported. This is said not to be unusual at this time of the year. Attorneys advised that in the absence of an epidemic the health commissioner's power to compel vaccination was doubtful.

Dr. Pinto said yesterday that he would require the vaccination of persons in public schools or other places, who might have been exposed to smallpox.

The general vaccination was proposed by him against a possible spread of the epidemic now prevalent in Kansas City and Denver.

"I do not intend to fight or go into court to require vaccination," said Dr. Pinto yesterday. "I expect co-operation. If anyone refuses to be vaccinated, then let him take his chances on having smallpox."

Dr. Pinto had addressed 300 letters to business institutions directing that all employees should be vaccinated. He announced orally in connection with those letters that the penalty for noncompliance would be absence from work for a period of 18 days. Dr. Pinto now withdraws this announcement.

"The health department shall vaccinate all school children who have been exposed to the disease, and will require teachers and children vaccinated or debarred from school," Dr. Pinto announced.

Influx of German Goods

Reduces Prices for Toys

German toys are again on the Omaha market. Most of them, packed for shipment in 1919 and held up by the war blockade, have just arrived.

Toy trains, mechanical toys, silky-haired dolls and stuffed animals, all made in Germany, are being displayed by Omaha stores as Christmas approaches.

According to buyers of the different stores displaying the imported toys, the influx of German toys has greatly reduced toy prices.
