A Camera Story of the making of a great Cigarette

No. 3 We have told you how the tobaccos for Chesterfield cigarettes are aged and mellowed for two long years. of a series Now comes the blending. And of all things affecting cigarette taste, blending is second in importance only to the quality of the tobaccos themselves.

The Turkish and Domestic tobaccos are blended to a secret recipe—which cannot be copied. Our blenders balance these fine tobaccos, one against another, for aroma, for body, for taste. The balance must be right, the proportions exact, else the blend could not have that complete and satisfying Chesterfield flavor.

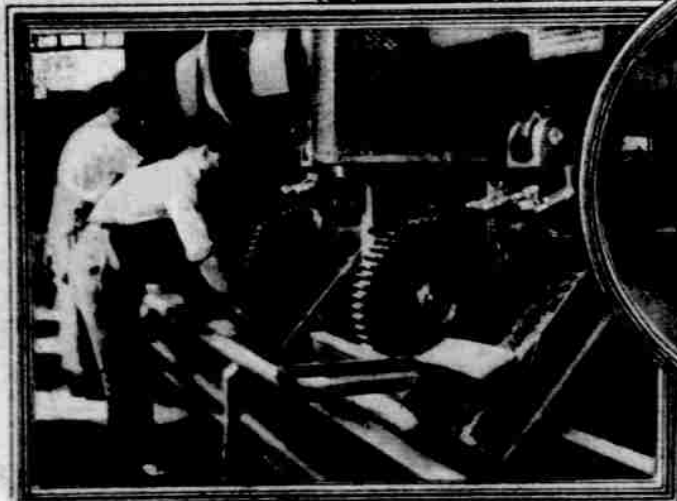

(Right) A stemming machine which removes the backbone or stem of the leaf, leaving "strip tobacco" ready for manufacture.

Another view of the mixing cylinder from opposite side.

(Below) Cutting machines which cut or shred the "strip tobacco" as received from the mixing cylinder.

(Left) The shredded tobacco is fed into a cylindrical dryer where the flavor is "set" by high temperature. A second cylinder removes excessive heat and moisture.

The different varieties of tobaccos, Turkish and Domestic, are taken from the hogheads and bales, each in the correct proportion, and conveyed into the mixing cylinder.
