

My Marriage Problems

Adapted from the New Phase of "Revelations of a Wife"

Why Madge Grew Worried as She Neared Home.

Dicky's face was a ludicrous study when he whistled at my quiet announcement, and saw the big truck come lumbering down the hill toward us.

Relief at the prospect of aid with the blown-out tube, chagrin at the speedy fulfillment of my prophetic suggestion, which he had scooped so unobtrusively, a sheepish subconscious wish that I had not yet been proved to be in the wrong—all these in swiftly changing succession were mirrored in Dicky's eyes.

I did not resent the last of the three emotions. In justice I could not, for deep down, though I conscientiously tried to smother it, was a jubilant little feminine pique at this delay caused by the blown-out tire. Dicky had so decidedly snubbed me when I had asked if the cars were in readiness for the trip, had been so arrogant in his reply, that I would have been a Griselda indeed not to have wished for a tiny accident to puncture his cocksureness.

Now the accident had happened, and any musty doubts of my conscience were quelled by the practical certainty that the truck driver's aid would be available. With calmness and a little experience of the usual disaster, I turned away from the disabled car.

"Are They Hurt?"

"I'll only be in the way," I remarked with elaborate casualness, "so I'll just stroll over to the other car."

"You're a wise woman," Dicky's tone was acid. "Believe me, I'm in no mood for any feminine comment or supervision."

I lost no time in acting upon the permission, for I was anxious to help Lillian in whatever scheme she had for taking care of the peaches which Dicky had insisted upon leaving dumped into the bottom of my car. As I reached the other car I found her kneeling on the front seat, and leaning over into the tonneau, her hands firmly holding one of the sacks which she had secured from the farmer's wife. Marion, kneeling on the back seat, was picking up peaches from the floor and putting them into the sacks, while Janice, perched beside her, was also helping—in his own estimation, and in Marion's, to judge from the enthusiastic admiration she gave him.

"Get in here beside me quick, and take another sack," Lillian said when she saw me. "You can hold with one hand and fill with the other until they get too heavy. When they're full I know I can pack them and take another sack."

"Where are the suitcases?" I asked, as I climbed in beside her and began to work feverishly.

"In that little gully down there," she indicated by head toward the side of the road. "I watched Dicky carefully so I know he didn't see me put 'em there."

"Are they hurt?" Of course, they were on top of the peaches instead of the seat.

Madge Is Apprehensive.

"Correct," she smiled. "But there hasn't been much damage done so far. The sacks kept the peaches though, of course, the juice came through a little. But I wiped them off, tossed the worst bruised peaches—there were only a few of them—into the ravine, and I think the others won't be spoiled at all. But I do want to get them all fixed before Dicky gets over here. What's he doing now?"

I put my head out of the side of the car, took a quick survey of the scene behind me, and reassured Lillian instantly.

"Everything serene," I said smiling in my own relief. "The truck driver evidently has succumbed to Dicky's entreaties, and is at work upon the tire."

"Well hurry like mad, nevertheless," she answered. "For those commercial drivers are quick and experienced workers."

We accordingly hurried to such purpose that before the tire was changed the peaches had been securely sacked, and the suitcases and bags weighed in so tightly with them that there was no possibility of their jarring. With canny forethought, we left upon the top of the pile the case which contained the things Dicky would need for the night.

"There!" Lillian exclaimed when we had finished. "They can't possibly get bruised or spoil anything now if they are disturbed. Let's hope nothing more happens."

I fervently echoed her wish, and found it granted, for the rest of our journey was as commonplace and uneventful as our ordinary drives to the postoffice. Dicky either did not see or deliberately ignored the change we had made in the packing of the peaches, and we arrived in the Connecticut village at which we had intended to spend the night without a mishap.

The next morning we left the mediocre but fairly comfortable hotel and hurried down the Connecticut coast of the sound to New London. We reached there just in time to get the afternoon boat, and after a most delightful ride over the sound to Sag Harbor, we began the final lap of our journey to the farm.
