Six Operators of Farms Among Members of Fair Sex—President and Mrs. Harding to Receive.

Washington, Jan. 17.—Twenty-four women have been invited to attend the national agricultural conference which will convene here next Monday. Secretary Wallace announced yesterday. Six of them, he added, operate their own farms and the others are representatives of the home economics work who are familiar with farm conditions. Their names will be announced later. He also announced that President and Mrs. Harding would receive the delegates and their wives next Monday evening at the White House. More than half of the delegates, Mr. Wallace said, will be "dirt" farmers and more than one-third of the remainder representatives of state agricultural departments, state agricultural colleges and editors of farm papers. "Thus, two-thirds of the personnel will be strictly of the agricultural people," he said. "The others will consist of allied agricultural interests. If the farmers are to work out of their present situation they must have the help of interests dependent on agriculture. The greatest value of the conference, it was said, would probably be matters of policy, which, it is hoped, will be worked out looking towards the future of a self-sustaining farming policy. The conference, it was declared, would be expected to lay down such recommendations for agricultural policy as would help avoid periods of depression.

The Story of Ninette

(Continued from Yesterday.) CHAPTER XIII. Dorothy Takes a Hand. Ninette was rather grave as she followed Margaret Delany downstairs for luncheon; she looked about her curiously as she went. The house certainly had been built for comfort; there was a wide fireplace in the hall where a log fire burned cheerily, though the day was hardly cold enough to warrant it and Ninette thought she never had seen so many rugs and cushions and armchairs. There were lots of flowers and ferns, too—flowers everywhere on the tables—in the windows, on the mantel-shelves and the tables as they entered the dining room was a mass of shaggy brown and yellow chrysanthemums. Peter Nothard was there, standing in the window talking to a square-shouldered, rather good-looking man, who was introduced to Ninette as Margaret's husband. He had thick, straight hair brushed back from his forehead in American fashion, and penetrating dark eyes which somehow made Ninette feel uncomfortable. He shook hands with her and said he was glad to see her; he asked one or two perfunctory questions about the drive, and then turned to his wife. "What are we waiting for, dear? Isn't luncheon ready?" Margaret flushed a little and glanced uneasily at her brother, but just as she was about to answer the door opened, and a girl came into the room. At first sight Ninette thought she was the most perfect little creature she ever had seen; it was so shy, that she made the mistake of her opinion. She was very slim, almost childish in her figure, and her hair, which was cut in the approved "bobbed" fashion, was of a perfect shade of red which not even the unkindest of critics could have called dyed. She had blue eyes, with dark curly lashes, and a charming mouth which seemed almost smiling. Margaret Delany introduced her nervously. "This is Miss Manners, Ninette—I hope you will be great friends, Peter, there is no need to introduce you." Nothard bowed formally; his face was a little pale, and his mouth set in a hard line. "It is a long time since we met," he said. "Yes," Dorothy's blue eyes searched his face with swift criticism, and the color rose a little in her pale cheeks. "It's a long time," she agreed. "Nearly three years." Margaret's husband interrupted. "Well, if we're all here, we might have lunch, don't you think?" They took their places at the table, and two smartly dressed maids waited. Ninette was shy and ill at ease; she hardly ate anything though she had said she was hungry, and she did not touch the wine which she had been too shy to refuse. She sat next to Peter Nothard, and at first he tried to talk to her, but after a few monosyllabic replies he gave it up and devoted himself to his sister, at whose right hand he was seated. There was an empty chair next to Dorothy Manners, and presently Ninette asked Arthur Delany shyly: "Please, who ought to be there?" He glanced at the empty chair, and laughed at her quaintly worded question. "Oh, that's Dick Felsted's place—he's always late, and so we never bother to wait for him. He went out on his motor like this morning, and I dare say he had an accident by this time—he has a couple of dozen a week, according to all accounts." "He's just a scatter-brain!" Margaret interrupted, laughing. "But he's a dear boy; I think you'll like him, Ninette." "I don't care for men much as a rule," Ninette said bluntly. Everyone looked at Nothard and he colored in a faint embarrassment. "Ninette is the most candid young lady I have ever met," he said lightly. "You will find that out, Margaret, before she has been here very long." Dorothy Manners had hardly spoken since the beginning of lunch, but she said now, with her pretty laugh: "You must get on well with Peter, then, Miss—Ninette—I don't think anyone has told me your proper name!—because he loves candid people, don't you, Peter?" she appealed directly to Nothard. "He met her eyes fairly and squarely. 'I hate a liar more than anything in the world,' he said quietly. There was an uncomfortable little silence; Arthur Delany was looking at his brother-in-law with faint amusement; Margaret was flushed and uncomfortable. "How dreadfully serious we are all getting," she said, a trace of annoyance in her voice. "I don't like serious lunch parties! Peter, when are you coming to see me again?" "I am very busy—I am afraid I can't spare the time yet awhile," he answered decidedly. "That doesn't sound very polite," Ninette said quietly. Everyone laughed and the little cloud that seemed to have fallen over them was dispersed; conversation was merry enough till the meal was ended, and Margaret rose. "We'll leave Peter and Arthur to hore one another," she said; she took Ninette's hand. "Come along now and Dorothy—we will enjoy ourselves far more without the men."

As they were crossing the hall, a side door which led into the garden opened rather loudly, and a young man with a hot flushed face and a rather dusty looking tweed suit, entered. He pulled off his cap when he saw the three girls, and looked at Margaret with laughing apology. "I'm so sorry, but I had a heasty accident, the tire blew off and I chucked me over a hedge! No, I'm not hurt, but the dear old m-bike is! I left her in the ditch and walked home. I suppose you haven't kept lunch for me?" Margaret laughed. "You know quite well I have, Dick; this is Ninette; you have heard so much about her already, that I am sure you feel that you know her quite well. No, don't shake hands with her—Ninette—she just reeks with oil, and horrors like that. Run away and wash, there's a dear boy! The men are still in the dining room." She led the way to the drawing room on the opposite side of the hall.

CHAPTER XIV. "Not Even a Thank You." "Who is he, please?" Ninette asked. She was very interested in everyone, she had never been among so many people at a time before. "He's Dick Felsted," Margaret answered. "The only son of Sir William Felsted. They live about 15 miles from here in a lovely old place, but Dick finds it dull, and he likes being with us." "Be honest and say that he's in love with you," Dorothy Manners said laughingly. She was lying back on a Chesterfield couch, smoking a cigar, and admiring her dainty figure in a long mirror opposite. "It's Margaret he comes here to see," she told Ninette. "Such nonsense!" Margaret objected. "He's years younger than I am! How can you say such things, Dorothy?" "And is he rich?" Ninette asked. "Rich—well, his father is," Margaret answered. "Why do you ask?" "Because I think money is the only thing in the world worth having," Ninette said calmly. "I'm sorry for anyone who is poor; I know what it is. Josh and I were poor—so poor that sometimes I didn't know where to get our cat meal from, when he was ill." She looked at Margaret with challenging eyes. "I suppose Mr. Nothard told you," she said. "No—he only told me that you belonged to a friend of his." "Josh wasn't a friend of his?" Ninette interrupted rudely. "He was just a struggling journalist on one of Mr. Nothard's papers." There was a hard note of bitterness in her voice, and Margaret flushed sensitively. "Perhaps I've got it wrong," she said rather awkwardly. "I dare say I misunderstood what Peter said. Anyway, I know he is very anxious for you to be happy and have a good time—and I hope you will." She broke off as the door opened and Peter came in. He was wearing his overcoat again and Margaret ran to meet him with a little cry of dismay. "Peter—you are not going so soon! Why, I've hardly seen anything of you." "My dear—I'm sorry, but I must get back. I told you I could only stay to lunch, you know. I'll come again some other time." He looked at Ninette, but went past her to the couch where Dorothy was reclining in a heap of cushions. "Good-bye," he said formally. He held out his hand, just touched her, and turned away. "He doesn't love her now, at any rate," Ninette told herself, as she followed him into the hall. "He could never look at her like that if he still loved her."

Kellogg's Bran is nature's own relief from constipation!

You must not take chances with constipation when statistics tell you that nine-tenths of all sickness can be traced to it! You must get permanent relief; you must drive constipation out of your system! Realize that pills and cathartics, at best, can only afford temporary relief, while they are irritating to the delicate intestinal tract. Now—compare the action of these pills and cathartics with the natural and wholesome effect of Kellogg's Bran, cooked and krumbled. Science knows of no such wonderful sweeper, cleanser and purifier of the bowels as Kellogg's Bran, yet it is simply nature's food. Bran's effect is certain and relief permanent. At least two tablespoonsful are eaten daily. Chronic cases should eat as much more as is necessary for results. Taken consistently, Kellogg's Bran will drive constipation from the system. Your physician will endorse the use of Kellogg's Bran for constipation! Eat Kellogg's Bran either as a delicious and nutritious cereal, or sprinkle it over your favorite cereal. Eat it in many other foods which are made more appetizing by its nut-like flavor. Kellogg's Bran pancakes are the best you ever tasted! Use it in raisin bread or muffins, gravies, macaronis, pancakes, etc. (Recipes on package.) The big thing is to get Kellogg's Bran into your system quickly! Give it to every member of your family! P. S.—Pimples are caused by constipation. Kellogg's Bran will clear them up and also free your breath from intestinal odors.
