Gene Tunney, American Light Heavyweight Champ of America?

All the world hails Gene Tunney as the American light heavyweight champion.

But it seems that he isn't. How come? you ask. No one connects Ted (Kid) Lewis with the title—but it looks as if Ted is the crown toter just the same.

Let's take a dip into history via the records. Levinzky was the light-heavyweight champion of the entire globe until October 12, 1920, when Georges Carpentier bumped the "Battler" off and grabbed himself the crown.

Under all existing rules Levinzky lost the championship of the United States. Yet, more than a year later, Levinzky, parading as the light-heavyweight champ, was matched with Gene Tunney in a title bout.

Meanwhile, the unused champ, McCormick, picked himself out a loat and went to England. He got in a quarrel with Ted Lewis and the latter knocked him rolling for a technical knockout in the 14th round.

That would indicate that Lewis is the American champion of the light-heavies.

Perhaps the managers of Levinzky and Tunney may be able to prove some way, somehow, that the McCormick-Levinzky affair wasn't a real honest-to-goodness championship affair.
