CHAPTER XIV. The Masked Bandit.

It was no wonder that Master Meadow Mouse was startled. He cowered inside his nest in the top of the shock of corn. The whole shock shook. There was a terrible rustle of dry leaves as Fatty Coon tore away stalk after stalk.

"Old Mr. Crowe never did this!" Master Meadow Mouse stammered. "He never disturbed my rest. But this awint Fatty Coon means to catch me. And I don't know what Meanwhile Fatty Coon was muttering horribly to himself as he worked.

"This fellow must be fat," he grunted to himself, as he wrenched at a stubborn stalk with claws and "With all this corn to feast on, he must be in fine trim, Mm!

One good look was enough for Master Meadow Mouse

He ought to be just right to top off a good meal of corn."
"My goodness!" Master Meadow Mouse gasped. "How annoying! He intends to cat me." For a few moments Master Mea-dow Mouse wondered whether he ought to fight or run, "I wish," he thought, "that I'd brought my old ed to something akin to brilliance. sign with me when I moved to this But all the time, like a swift undernew home. about his business." But idle thoughts and wishes were that he must act-and act quickly.

So Master Meadow Mouse left his nest and crept a short distance unbetween two cornstalks. In the moonlight he had a fine view of me to tackle."

There was no denying that Fatty Coon looked both huge and dangerous. Across his face was a black mask which only added to his horrid appearance. And through the mask his eyes shone green and greedy right into the frightened ones of Master Meadow Mouse.

One good look was enough for laster Meadow Mouse. He drew back hurriedly. Through his mind there flashed a saying of his mother that he had not thought of for a long time: "He that fights and away will live to fight another day.

"I'll run first," Master Meadow Mouse decided. "Then perhaps I shan't have to fight at all."

Then he stole out of the shock of corn, on the opposite side. And when Fatty Coon pawed his way through to the nest he found it

He gave a wail of anger and dis-

"He's gone! The Meadow Mouse has gone!" Fatty bawled. "And I'll warrant he was a fat one, too, It's always the fattest ones that get away. And nobody can deny that this one was living high," (Copyright, 1922)
