

SLEEPY-TIME TALES THE TALE OF THE MULEY COW

BY ARTHUR SCOTT BAILEY

CHAPTER XXIII.

The Vow of a Cow.

All the cows in the barn were much upset. They had heard some news that didn't please them. Farmer Green was going to buy a milking machine!

"He'll never use it on me," the Muley Cow declared. "None of my family has ever been milked by a machine, and I don't intend to be the first."

Her companion had felt just as she did. If Farmer Green could have listened to the mutterings and rumblings and murmurings he might not have dared bring any milking machine. But he never dreamed that the whole herd was against one. As for his son, Johnnie—and even the hired man—they had said all along that they thought a milking machine would be a fine thing to have.

"Not for me!" the big white cow replied.

The hired man had milked cows all his life—millions of them, so he said! And he told Johnnie that he no longer found any fun in turning out of a warm bed on a cold winter's morning long before daylight, to milk cows.

Now, Johnnie Green had only learned to milk during the summer before. But strange to say, he had already begun to feel somewhat as the hired man did. Milking was not half the sport that it was in the beginning.

The great day came at last when the milking machine arrived. There was an unusual bustle in the cow barn while it was being set up and Jim Dodge he says that drinking is a habit we should shun, that it brings on prematurely the sinking of life's sun. He says that drinking liquor will make you beat your wife and slumber in the gutter field when you depart this life. Jim sure lambasts the liquor; but take a tip from him—he sneezes best just after he's been upon a spree, and I can't keep from thinking if I were in his shoes, I'd either quit my preachin' or lay off of the boozey.

Parents' Problems

How can courage best be taught to children?

Place the emphasis on moral rather than on physical encouragement. Show that no other quality is so constantly needed in everyday life. Children understand most easily the great spectacular displays of courage, so let them hear and read of many such; but make it plain to them that the stuff of which heroes are made is developed by constant overcoming of small fears and difficulties.

Annual Rout of City Hall

Pigeons Begun by Martins Spring is in fact here, according to Belle M. Ryan, assistant superintendent of schools.

Her martins arrived yesterday morning. On her window ledge is a martin house which is occupied every season by martins, who arrive between April 10 and 15.

These birds are said to travel from South America to this section during the early spring. When they arrive at the city hall the sparrows and pigeons are evicted by the newcomers.
