Elizabeth moved aside quickly to avoid knocking into a girl who had hurriedly turned a corner, and it was Nettie herself.
"Elizabeth! Good heavens!"
"There was a note of unkindness in Nettie Stacey's voice and Elizabeth felt as if someone had touched her heart with ungentle fingers. She had been so glad to see her. It had seemed the next best thing to meeting Royston, but the eager welcome died from her eyes as she heard that friendly note.
"Well, I never expected to see you again," Nettie said bluntly.
"Why not? I wrote. I begged you to come and see me. I had Elizabeth spoke breathlessly. The color came and went nervously in her face. She put out both hands and impulsively caught Nettie's. "Oh, I am so glad to see you," she said.
Nettie said, "Humph!" She looked hard at Elizabeth. "Come into this parlor and talk to me if you care about it," she added doubtfully.
"Of course, I will," Elizabeth's spirits rose again. This was some one out of the past, a link with the greatest happiness she had ever known.
"So you wrote to me, did you?" Nettie asked, when they had ordered tea. "Well, I never got it, and that's a fact. I've said lots of hard things about you to Pat, but he always laughed at me. I think he knew that he'd take you right away from us."
Her dark eyes searched Elizabeth's flushed face. "Well, they've made a difference in you already," she said.
Elizabeth answered eagerly: "They haven't! I'm just the same in my heart, and I've longed to see you. I wrote ten days after I wrote to madame—a long letter, and told you all about everything. I wrote to Mr. Royston, too."
"Did you? Well, we never had the letters. I dare say madame wouldn't let them be sent; she doesn't think much of you, you know. There was a little silence. Then

Federal Control of Radio Needed

Expert Declares Messages Are Clogging the Air.

With the radio rage growing in disconcerting speed through the country, technical experts in wireless telegraphy and telephony are one in opinion that the number of stations and the regulation of radio science—either by the federal government or by a national association of wireless fans.

Statistics show that there are more than 1,000,000 professional and amateur radio operators in the United States. With that number increasing rapidly as the rage is spreading, a noted expert in radio in New York City has this to say:

"It is imperative that the federal government act with more expedition in the matter of air control for the dissemination of information by radio than that was the case in the mapping of the skies and regulations appertaining thereto for the use of aircraft.

"When the loud speaking radio-phonograph was perfected, every amateur in the country wanted to listen in. Then came the greed to send. Stations all over the land under no control were sending out stuff on the same wave length, and the air was full of interesting signals that were caught by instruments everywhere.

"So it stands to reason that absolute control of the air must be taken by the national authorities. Secretary Hoover of the Department of Commerce, under which division of the government the matter will find jurisdiction, recently told President Harding of the growing menace to the entire radio science through the disorganization now existing.

LISTENING IN

"Let music swell the breeze, and ring from all the trees..."

Little did the author of these thoughts suspect that some day this thought would be carried out literally. Every night from the Omaha Grain Exchange sending station, Victor records are broadcast through the air for hundreds of miles. One record is played for "tuning in" purposes, the daily market report is given, and then more records are played for 15 minutes.

If, after wiring up a set, you hear nothing but a steady hum in the receivers, you may be very sure that there is an open circuit somewhere. Trace out the wiring carefully and some little fault will present itself.

Remember that 75 ohm receivers, as used in ordinary line telephone work, are entirely unsuited for radio work. Of course, some will work, but most of them will not. Get a pair of 2,000 ohm receivers and be sure of results.
