My Marriage Problems

Adelo Garrison's New Phase of "REVELATIONS OF A WIFE" (Copyright 1922)

The Report of Katherine Made to Lillian and Madge. We reached Dr. Pettit's office at a quarter before the hour he had named in his message. In obedience to Lillian's suggestion we had left the car in front of the library, had gone in, taken out a book apiece and upon coming out she had looked sharply up and down the street to see if by any possibility the man whom we knew as Smith was in the vicinity.

"That's easy," Lillian said in a low voice when the woman who took care of the physician's quarters had taken herself out of the room. "He's bringing Katherine herself, cutting it very fine, so that she shall be away from the hospital the least possible stretch of time. Good boy, Herbie, I didn't think he had it in him."

I guessed that the levity in her voice and words masked an unusual nervous tension, and I wondered a bit at her evident strong feeling in this matter. I knew that she had handled problems seemingly of much greater importance than this meeting of two men—if they did meet. For a minute I let my fancy play with the idea that we were all at sea, and that Smith and the man in the hospital were nothing to each other.

Dr. Pettit, with a stilled little bow, closed the door between himself and us, and Lillian uttered a tense monosyllable. "Well?" "He came to bat, all right," Katherine answered. "Who? Smith?" "If You Knew—" "The man you described to me as Smith. Even if you hadn't told me, mate honesty kept her from the disclaimer a less sincere woman would have offered. "But, you see," she stammered, "I had so much experience with sick men and boys over there. I ought to know something about handling them."

"Over us both swept the realization, old, yet ever new, of what this slender, starchy-eyed woman had undergone in those long months of service in the overseas hospitals. I knew that no one in the nursing service held a more creditable record than Katherine, yet she rarely referred to those days.

"I'll radio the ships at sea you ought to know—and do," Lillian said emphatically. "But let us get on with the tale. The man is tractable now, eh?" "Oh, yes, entirely so," Katherine rejoined. "In fact, I think he is beginning to like me. He called me a lovely lady today."

"Well," she said, hesitating. "If I begin at the beginning I'll be like the child trainer and the grandmother of the child."

"That's what I want," said Lillian. "Go back to the minute you entered the hospital."

"It involves something—even further back than that," smiled Katherine, "and that is the treatment his former nurse was compelled to give him. You see, when he first became conscious there were so many little things in which she had to antagonize him. He didn't want to take his medicine, and he wanted food he couldn't have, and, oh, I don't know what all! At any rate he fairly hated her, and as for the poor girl, she was a wreck. But, you see, he was getting better all the time, so after I came I didn't have to impose nearly so many restrictions on him, and the result was that he became very tractable."

"Of course, you have given us the only reason for his becoming tractable," Lillian said dryly, and I smiled with her at Katherine's genuinely puzzled look at us. She is so modest about the great skill which is hers in nursing, and about the potency of her personality. I sometimes think she does not realize herself the power that lies in her.

"Of course, if you had nursed him when he first became conscious he would have been just as hard to manage," I suggested slyly. Katherine flushed shyly. Her innate honesty kept her from the disclaimer a less sincere woman would have offered.

"But, you see," she stammered, "I had so much experience with sick men and boys over there. I ought to know something about handling them."

"Over us both swept the realization, old, yet ever new, of what this slender, starchy-eyed woman had undergone in those long months of service in the overseas hospitals. I knew that no one in the nursing service held a more creditable record than Katherine, yet she rarely referred to those days.

Advertisement for Betsy Ross bread. Includes images of sugar bags (CORN SUGAR, SUGAR SUBSTITUTES, RAW SUGAR, REFINED GRANULATED SUGAR) and a loaf of bread. Text: 'There's a difference in Sugar—Therefore', 'HERE is a distinction you can taste. Every one of the sweetening ingredients illustrated, except refined granulated sugar gives to bread a heavy, sweetish taste similar to that of molasses. In fact, molasses is among the substitutes used to give flavor to certain cheaper breads.', 'BETSY ROSS contains only the highest grade of granulated sugar and has, as a result, a delicate, even taste. This refined sugar is free from impurities, and, weight for weight, contributes more to the food value of the loaf.', 'But without this distinction being called to your attention, would you give thought to whether or not your baker might be using a low grade sugar or a substitute? This goes to prove, does it not, that there is a difference in bread?'

Problems That Perplex

Answered by BEATRICE FAIRFAX.

Parents Object. My Dear Beatrice: Like many others, I am coming to you for a few lines of advice. It's the same old story, only just a little different. I am a girl past 20 years old who thinks she ought to have a little to say about what she wants to do, and with whom she cares to go.

I have been going with a young man of good character for the past two years, but nearly every time I went it meant a fuss at home, and now it's getting much worse. It's just because the young man is not rich. If he had money, all would be o. k.

This young man is also blamed because his father drinks, but he himself never touches it, as he says he can see that wrong it has done his father. The young man works every day, is steady and has a very good reputation amongst the business men of his town. His aim is to make good. He goes to church and for a while taught a Sunday school class. He has himself stay at home, helping mother. The question is: Shall we fight it out and stay together or shall I give him up for these silly causes?

Thanking you for your time, I am, respectfully, LORRAINE. P. S.—Don't think we overdo it by running around three or four times a week, as we seldom go out more than once a week, and sometimes not that. It would be wrong for me to pass absolute judgment on your case, knowing only one side. Your parents may see with clearer eyes than their 20-year-old daughter. If they have done a good job of bringing you up, educated you, taught you the things around a home, a girl should know, and all the rest, it seems to me their judgment in the matter of beaux should have some weight with you. You owe them much in the way of respect and confidence.

Met Another Man. "Dear Miss Fairfax: I am a girl, 18, and going steady now for a year with a fellow whom I loved dearly. But lately I met a young man and I am in love with him. Please advise me what to do, as I intend to give up my friend and go with the other fellow, as he has told me he loves me and asked me to marry him. M. A."
