

The Dancing Master

There was nothing heroic about Royston, except in Elizabeth's eyes, save perhaps his renunciation of her love, but a woman's ideals are, after all, set by her own requirements rather than by any standard of perfection, and so it was with Elizabeth.

She loved him; she wanted him, and nobody else in the world could ever take his place. She had only desired success to please him, and by the irony of fate it was because of him that she had failed.

As yet she only vaguely realized what it meant, and that now she was entirely dependent upon Farmer for her future; for the moment she was a prey to her own desperate unhappiness and longing.

Then Mme. Senestis arrived, and miserable scenes of rage and vituperation began all over again; and when Farmer tried to interfere and stem the tide of her volubility, madame rounded on him.

She said that he was greatly to blame for Elizabeth's ignominious failure; she raved up and down the room, running her fingers through her cropped hair frantically.

"You spoil her; you are a fool, a great big fool also!" she screamed at him. "Will she try? Will she work when she knows you are there waiting for her to just drop into the arms you hold out? She is fat, and it does not matter. She does not care. You take her; but for me, what is there for me? I have a failure, what would you? My good name it is gone; it is down in the dust. No more I am famous; no more they come to me; I have to leave London. I am ashamed. The duchess she never ask me to her house again. Oh, I could kill myself!"

"You're talking rubbish," Farmer said curtly. "You're not ruined. Any one could see that it was pure mischance on Elizabeth's part. She started well enough, and she will try again some other time, and all that we prophesied for her will come true. She is not well; I have seen a change in her for weeks past. We ought not to have subjected her to the strain tonight."

He stood beside Elizabeth, his arm on her chair, his eyes defiant.

Madame snapped her fingers impatiently in his face. "You are rich. For you it is nothing, nothing!" she declared. "You lose money; you have more, but I have none. I depend on what I can get as from you; but not again will I take her," and she looked at Elizabeth with savage eyes. "Not again I take a second risk; not all the money in London will buy the work of Victorine Senestis a second time."

She bent closer to Elizabeth. "You go; you leave my house," she said.

Farmer stifled an oath; his face was purple with rage. "You're mad; you're out of your mind," he said hoarsely. "How dare you speak to her like this? Hasn't she gone through enough? And now you threaten to turn her out of the house. You will do nothing of the sort—you hear. Elizabeth will stay until I take her away as my wife."

Madame shrugged her shoulders. She walked over to a table, found a cigarette and lit it with shaking fingers. After a few puffs she was quieter. She wiped her hot face.

"So, that is it," she said. "Very well, now we know. She stay here till you marry her, but you marry her quick and take her away. I have no room in my house for a little fool who get frightened because there are a crowd and many eyes."

"She will stay here till I can marry her," Farmer said obstinately, "and you may rest assured that it will be as quickly as possible."

He knew Mme. Senestis well; knew that in her present mood she held all his money as nothing; her pride was damaged; she considered that her prestige had irrevocably suffered, and that was a thing she could not forgive.

Elizabeth listened apathetically; Farmer's words conveyed very little to her; she only realized that he was kind, and that in him she seemed to have a friend. When presently he told her it was time she went to bed and that he would settle with Mme. Senestis and come again in the morning, she obeyed without question.

She went up to her room and tried to undress her frock, but its fastenings were obscure, and she felt too tired to trouble. She was still wearing it, sitting on the side of the bed, her eyes fixed on the floor, when an hour later, Mme. Senestis came into the room.

Madame looked at her, ashamed, and her voice was kinder when she spoke to Elizabeth. Neil Farmer had presented her with a handsome check for the loss she chose to consider she had suffered that night, and she was beginning to realize that, after all, it would be foolish to quarrel with him; he was an influential as well as a rich man.

"You stay here," she began abruptly, "you go to bed and sleep like a good girl. We are friends again—hey?"

Elizabeth raised her eyes, but made no answer, and madame went on: "You are fortunate. Mr. Farmer, he love you very much, he make you his wife, he marry you quick," she laughed nastily. "You marry him to pay all the many debt you owe him."

A painful color crept into Elizabeth's pale face.

"The debt I owe him," she echoed almost stupidly; then with a rush she remembered the money she had borrowed from him for Enid Sanger, and afterwards for Royston, and that those two checks were quite apart from all he had paid for her training and for her very existence since she came to madame.

She felt as if a mocking voice was singing gleefully in her ears:

"And now you can never pay him back! Now you can never pay him back!"

RADIO Radiophone to Be Boon to Commerce

Farmer, Rancher and Merchants Will Be Aided in Business by Wireless.

Each day finds new uses for radio. The small town merchant, the farmer and rancher can learn the market value of his crops or cattle. He learns what is being shipped and how much he should secure for the product of his labors.

It is an old story now of how ships are guided in storms, how almost immediate rescue is at hand, of persons being doctored 1,000 miles away, of sitting in your own home and hearing famous artists, speakers and the news of the world.

Radio is destined to play a big and important part in the lives of the nations, to bind us more closely together. A radio expert predicts that another decade will see the following—a few of the things that may happen. In practically every home, whether it be a house on the prairie, the small town or the cave-dweller or the huge apartment houses of the big cities, there will be a radio receiving set, simple and practical, where all the news and events of the world will be daily spread before us.

Commercial Use.

For invalids—those confined to their homes, it will come as a blessed boon. To them will come the news, music, lectures, sermons on Sundays to pass the weary hours.

To the merchant will come daily reports of all the activities, prices and movements of goods in which he deals. The doctor will prescribe in many cases by wireless and thus kill himself!

SPARKS

Twenty-four years ago when Mrs. Bert Pinkerton, 3019 Pratt street, delivered a declamatory address at her graduation from high school, she predicted that the day would certainly come when "we shall have under our control the magnetic forces of the earth for commercial use."

Last Tuesday night, Mrs. Pinkerton saw her prediction materialized when her son, John, 19, listened in with his radio set on The Bee Good Will program that was broadcast from the Brandeis theater.

Besides hundreds of radio amateurs in Omaha who listened in on The Bee Good Will program at the Brandeis theater last Tuesday night, additional reports from J. A. Diahota of Howell, Neb.; Ivan Smith of Harlan, Ia.; and Cecil T. McAfee of Anita, Ia., showed that reach many patients where today he reaches one.

The stockbroker will be in constant and close touch with his clients and they with the latest movement in the stock market. Nations will talk with each other daily and hourly and much misunderstanding and trouble cleared away by close contact; ambassadors will either disappear or become as gilded messengers.

Armies will be guided in the field, aeroplanes will act, guided by radio. Navies of the world will be guided and directed, perhaps without manpower, by its wonderful power.

So after all, it looks as though radio has come to stay and promises to be a big part of our daily life.

QUESTIONS

G. F. A., Denison, Ia.
Q—Will a four-wire aerial 40 feet long be as good as a single wire 100 feet long?
(2) Can I tune to WAAW with this aerial? (3) If I attach a variocoupler and two variometers to the loading coil of my crystal set will I be able to tune higher?
A—(1) No. (2) You do not tune with the aerial to receive WAAW; it is all in your tuning coil. The coil that you have is a tuning coil, not a loading coil. (3) The introduction of two variometers and a variocoupler into this circuit will make your set absolutely useless. It can't be done.

D. S. C., Missouri Valley, Ia.
Q—Please tell me who and where 2AZR is.
A—2AZR is an amateur station belonging to C. C. Pyne, in the navy yard at Brookline.

Why Are Some Women Popular

happy, beloved and successful, while others drag out a negative existence, of no use to themselves or anyone else? Except in a few cases the answer is to be found in a state of freedom from the troubles known as "female." The well woman radiates cheerfulness and serenity, while the illing one repels because of her lack of these qualities. It is not necessary, however, to harbor aches and pains, and the "blues" that make one a detriment to society. The use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has brought relief to such women, and given them a new lease on life.

Southwest May Ship to Omaha

Conditions Spotted in Southern Cattle Country, Reports to Packers Show.

According to information received by M. R. Murphy, general manager of the Omaha plant of Cudahy & Co., range conditions in the cattle districts of the southwest are good in spots. The information covered conditions in Texas, parts of Arizona and New Mexico and was to the effect that there has been an abundance of rain in the country east of the Pecos river in Texas where the grass is an excellent condition.

Some parts of Texas and almost all of New Mexico are very dry and in great need of moisture and most of the cattle on those ranges will be moved to pastures in the north, the movement of some herds having already started. In the past two years Pacific coast packers have bought a large number of calves for veal, which has caused a shortage of veal in the district around Amarillo, Tex., a rather large hog business is being developed, the Cudahy company operating a buying center there which ships about 15 carloads of hogs a week to Pacific coast points. It is predicted the Omaha market will draw more business out of the southwest country this season than heretofore as stockmen of Texas, Arizona and New Mexico have found they have been selling cattle to traders that have been shipped to Omaha at a profit.

Fraternal Aid Teams to Drill

A competitive drill and initiation contest will be held in the Swedish auditorium next Tuesday at 2, by the Fraternal Aid union. Crack drill teams from Grand Island and Lincoln will compete for honors and a silver loving cup with the Banner-Mendamin lodge of Omaha. The cup is given by the officers of the society.

The teams will be entertained at noon luncheon and at 6 o'clock dinner on that day at Hotel Loyal. The dinner will be followed by dancing and an entertainment at the Swedish auditorium. The office of

W. J. Merryfield, district manager, 407 Omaha Building and Loan association building, will be used as a meeting place and rest room for the visitors during the day.

Joseph F. Findley, assistant division manager, is in charge of the arrangements.

This will be the first competitive drill that the society has held for eight years, it is said.

Accused of Stealing Team

Oaksho, Neb. May 18.—(Special) Bert Duncan, a young rancher, living 30 miles north of here, was arrested on a charge of stealing a team of horses from a neighbor. He was released on $2,000 bond to appear at preliminary hearing before County Judge Gunnar May 31. The alleged theft was committed two years ago.
