The Mission on Which Lillian Sent Tom Chester.

Under Tom Chester's tense fingers the lining of Smith's eyeglass case pulled away from the outer covering, giving Lillian and me a flashing glimpse of white, then as he lifted his hand, the lining snapped back into place, giving absolutely no indi-cation that it could be loosened. Lillian put out her hand, and the young man scrutinized it closely, and handed it to me. "It's cleverly constructed," she course. Give it the once over and see if you can detect the joining." In my turn I examined the beautifully fashioned thing, and shook my head in defeat.

erence in her manner which made me bite my lips to keep back a smile. That she, with her experience, had known from the first glimpse of the eyeglars case that it hid something I was sure, but for some rea-son she wished Tom Chester to think the discovery all his own. "Why!" he stammered boyishly.

"It seemed such a queer thing for him to carry when he was climbing up a rope ladder and over a roof. that I figured it meant something And I remembered-please don't laugh-romething I saw in a movie once and thought I'd try to pull the lining a bit. And when it came away I saw these pieces of queer white paper.

I anticipated Lillian's outstretched gave her back the case, and watched her tensely, as she pulled away the lining as far as it would go, and took out a packet of white papers, so apparently gauzy in texture that it reemed as though the slightest touch would tear them, yet evidently as indestructible as parch-

Ah-h!" The exclamation was but a breath, yet I knew that suddenly the importance of the thing Tom Chester had found had been enchanced in her eyes. She took the exsheets between her thumb and forefinger, felt of it, then raised the packet to her nose and sniffed experimentally.

"Invisible Ink?" "You found something, my lad, when you pulled that lining away," she said emphatically, and young Mr. Chester flushed to the roots of his hair with pleasure.

Invisible ink?" I ventured. "I'm practically certain of it," Lilian replied, "unless the gifted Mr. Smith has a patent cigarette paper, the secret of which he doesn't want to share with anybody. But we can't tell for certain until Allen Drake gets here. There's no use in experimenting with the thing twice, and if my guess is right, Allen will have to handle the thing anyway."

She put the papers carefully back use roller skates? closed the case with an air of finali-

With your permission, Mr. Chester," she said perfunctory, "I'll keep this. Now for the next thing. Do you think Smith lamed himself to any extent when he fell from the rope ladder? You spoke of his groan-

"I don't believe he will be able to take a step tomorrow," Mr. Chester replied. "It wasn't a break, or he wouldn't have been able to get home at all, although I imagine he's a pretty gritty proposition. But I im-he has a severe sprain.' 'Of course, he won't have a doctor tonight," Lillian mused. "But in the morning, he'll do doubt ask Mr. Briggs which is the best physician. Do you know whether or not Dr. Pettit attends the Briggs family?"

"I don't know." I returned, and Tom Chester shok his head. Lillian considered a minute, look ing into space.
"I think it's time I had a inter view with Mr. Briggs," she said. "From what I hear, he's a very able citizen, and will no doubt be able to keep his mouth shut, a rare accomplishment these days. But I must keep close tab on Smith. Mr. Chester, can you manage to see Briggs as early in the morning as he arises?"

She paused, and the young man answered her with a smile.

'That will be about 5 o'clock," he said, but if he expected Lillian to be astonished he must have been disappointed.

'Fine!" she exclaimed. "That will be just what I want. So you'd better run along home now, snatch what sleep you can and make it up to-morrow. Just ask Mr. Briggs to come over here as soon as he can

Old Peleg Brown is twisted 'till he never will be straight. And old Dock Gray it was who got old Peleg in this state. Now Peleg got lumbago and it put him on the bum and right away he crawled it. in bed and sent for Dock to come. Dock brought along some alcohol and rubbed old Peleg's back, and when old Peleg found it out his trolley jumped the track. He tried to lick that portion of his person Dock had soaked. And dislocated seven joints and very nearly croaked.
