

for a divorce from Margaret Mather, the emotional actress whom three years ago he loved better than his family and his name. Margaret Mather played here in the Lansing just after her marriage and then ended her season in Omaha. Of course, we all knew that the romance could not last. We all knew it that night when we heard her plead, "It is the nightingale and not the lark." We knew it when we heard her in that balcony scene which no other woman of this day has done so well. But I hoped it would end without disgrace, publicity or scandal. But that was not to be. It is fury, horse-whipping, hysterics and divorce. It's too bad. I think there was affection between those people once. That people can learn to loathe what they have once loved, that is about the toughest tragedy in life.

They are telling a rather good story of David Belasco and Henry Guy Carleton. Some one who happened to be up bright and early in the morning following the opening performance of "The Heart of Maryland," and "Ambition" clipped the morning criticisms of the two plays and sent those of Belasco's work to Carleton and vice-versa. Belasco supposed that the criticisms came from W. D. Mann, the Herald Square manager, and he at once despatched to him this bit of sarcasm: "Congratulate Messrs. Carleton and Goodwin. If you have time kindly try to discover whether there is being presented in the city a play called 'The Heart of Maryland.'"

Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Crane celebrated their silver anniversary in Indianapolis November 4.

William Winter is back again from England, having made his annual pilgrimage among the tombs of Westminster. It is queer about Winter. His especial mission in life seems to be to lament the dead and to weep for the days that are gone.

They say that Henry Irving's English is really becoming unbearable, and that the people who heard him open at Abbey's in Macbeth absolutely could not understand a word he said. They were familiar with the text and so managed to keep the place, but so far as Irving was concerned, he might as well have been talking Hindustanese. He speaks a dialect that is neither French, Welch nor Cornwall, and the import thereof no man knoweth.

If there is one of the many pitiable wrecks of better things that hang around New York who should be pitied more than the others it is Freddy Gebhard. The man is literally the end of a story. He is just a pale last chapter of a romance hanging around until an accident of some sort shall write fins over him. A friend of mine who knew both Gebhard and Langtry in their palmy days, when he was an active young blood with millions of money and a score of petty sweethearts, writes me that he is now just a faded, worn-out old man with a sort of cynical patience in his face. Meanwhile the Lily toils not nor spins, and is young and beautiful and about to marry a nobleman. Some things in this world are not fair.

Aside from these departments, the editorial and contributed features of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS are themselves equal in extent to a magazine. The Editor's "Progress of the World" is an invaluable chronicle of the happenings of the thirty days just past, with pictures on every page of the men and women who have made the history of the month.

The Literary World says: "We are deeply impressed from month to month with the value of the 'REVIEW OF REVIEWS,' which is a sort of Eiffel Tower for the survey of the whole field of periodical literature. And yet it has a mind and voice of its own, and speaks out with decision and sense on all public topics of the hour. It is a singular combination of the monthly magazine and the daily newspaper. It is daily in its freshness; it is monthly in its method. It is the world under a field glass."
