Clough and that the other looked like Georgs Woods. But Mr. Baldwin was in a burry. He doesn't believe the stories that are circulated.
Sunday is a day of rest, and the clever hostess who entertains on that day contributee, by the informality of her entertainment, to a good, restful time. There are a few homes among the young married people where the Sunduy tea is a feature. They eet ue exact hour, though all their friends know that their house and their dining rooms are open from 8 o'elock on. Nothing hot is served except chafing-dish tid bits and tea, and these may be made at any time during the evening. They are of ten made two or three times during the evening in eastern cities, as the oceasion demands. But in the cities where the custom is more general the favored guests at these Sunday evening reunions stroll into the tea table just as his appetite moves him, and any one of the group nesumes for the moment the duties of hostess. A small side table holds nuts and conserves and bon-bons, and a large punch bowl for thoee who prefer something etronger than tea. Bicycle teas are quite the proper thing at all summer reeorts. The rlaboratenees of some make them quite notable affars. Saturday afternoon teas are becoming the features of the week at these places. The inside life of summer society is to be found at one of these weekly gatherings. There the gossip of the place centers. A round these small tables are the golf players and richly clad ladies whose well-appointed trape Hash up to the door and flash away again. The afternoon tea on the "at home" day is not a fad of today, but was a social function as long ago as Queen Anne's reign. Then, as now, both ladies and gentlemen were invited, and mention is made of certain fashionable women who thus "visited seven houses in a single afternoon." Once more the afternoon ten is in reality a time set apart by a hostess to receive formal calls from every person on her visiting list. It present, the card of the guest is mail on the day of the "tes" proves that they fultilled this social obligation. It is said that an afternoon call, in recosnition of this form of hospitality, is neither expected nor required, as the hostess of the afternoon tea is the social debtor of her guests after it is over. In plainer phrasing, "her dear tive hundred friends" have called upon her, and it remaius for her to do likewise in return. With the dinner, the wedding reception, ete., it is rudeness not to maky a formal visit within the prescribed time.
London society is discussing two subjeets of great importance and of greater interest. What does society care about the boundaries of Venezuela or the Jamestown raid when it is said that William Waldorf Astor is a favored suitor for the hand of the Princess Victoria, the only unmarried daughter of the Prince of Wales, and that Queen Vietoria is seriously thinking of abdicative: The foundation for th first report is the fact that William Waldorf Astor's gift of a diamond of immense size and of absolute purity to the Princess Maud was accepted, not that it was presented-anybody who had a diamond would give it to a prince-but that it was accepted. For, in spite of his impecunious condition, the prince is very serupulous about accepting a present which is too costly an expression of the stage of intimacy the donor has been allowed to reach. The reason why the gift from the American to Maud was not returned is because he has paid Wales' debts, as the Rothchilds, Sir James MeKenzie, the Wilsons of Tranby Croft and Baron Hirseh have done before him. His guerdon is what theirs has been-social-pre-eminence, rather than intereat money. It he marries the Princese Victoria he stands a chance of being prince coneort. The succession to the throne. Between her o and the throne there are the precarious lives of her puny and delicate brother, the Duke of York, and his two frail children; her eldest sister, the Duchese of Fife, and her two qually delicate babies, no further family being expected in the ducal household by reason of the duke's ever steadily failing health. for his spine is seriously affected. King George III. had an enormous family, yet the dayghter of his sixth son now occupies the throne of Great Britain and ireland. It is, therefore, quite on the cards that Princess Victoria of Wales may succeed to the tnrone as Queen of Great Britain and Ireland and Emprese of India, in which event Mr. William Waldort Astor would ipee facto become prince consort, would occupy the chair of state to the left of the sovereign's throne, while his son by the Princess, should he happen to have one, would become the Prince of Wales. The victories that Americans have won over Eugland are not yet forgotten. To think that a representative of the country she once owned anc tried to beat into submission ahould aspire to the position of prince consort is an impertinence they re-rert. The other exciting topic is the report that the queen has decided to abdicate, which is based on the fact that she looked unusually feeble when she apppared at the wedding of Princess Maud, and that she is reported to have said it was the last time she should ever be in London. What she actually said was, that she wondered if it would be the last time she would be there. She is such a managing woman that the politiciane of London place so reliance on the rumors of abdication or of a regency under control of the queer. Abdication and regency combined have not caused the fluttering that Astor's astral aspirations have caused. The London correspondent of Town Topics sends the following of the queen's appearance in Landon at the time of the royal wedding: "As a rule, when she comes up, she drives about informally; indeed, she may be met in Regent street or Oxford street, just like any private lady, behind a pair of horses, in an unpretentious open carriage, without any special traffic arrangements. On Wednesday, however, the crush was so great in Piecadilly, near Hyde Park corner-alwaye the most crowded thoroughfare in the seasos-that the police were compelled to stop the traffic in order to allow her carriage to cross. So the heterogeneous mass of omnibuses, cabs, carriages, brewers' drays and big wagons haited, a compact phalanx on either side. We made out an open landaunot at all smart-containing an old lady in black with lovely now-white hair. All at once a rough man, an omnibus driver, eailed out, 'It's the Queen; God bless her:" and then an electric thrill seemed to go round. Passengers irside and outside the vehicles sprang up; the prim coachmen and footmen on the piivate carriages, usually as stolid as wax dolls, rose to their feet and shouted like schoolboys; the foot passengers swell. d the cheering; such a chear! London has not heard the like since Jubilee day. It was a sight I would not have missed for worlds, that forest of waving hats and handkerchiefs and the faces of the people, startled for once out of their British reserve. Every one in the crowd fixed eyes on the Queen as on a dearly beloved friend; every one shouted what came nearest: 'God bless you ma'am!' 'How well she looks!' 'God biess your Majesty?'Long life to her!' 'Hurrah: I wish the folk who talk about "smouldering discontent" and "organized demonstrations ${ }^{-}$had been there. As for the Queen, she burst into tears and bowed right and left, making spasmodic efforts to dry her eses with her black bordered handkerchiet between the l hear that since that day she astle sposen several times about tiue by it. The people -high and low for once united, watched her till she was quite out of sight; then the trafle was quite out of sight; then the traffle was resumed; every one looked at his or her neighbor; and every one, being Engliah. became self-conscious and sheepish. We are a wonderful people, certainly!"
