

ADDITIONAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

"A Black Sheep," the production of Charles Hoyt's clever pen was designed to entertain and bring dollars to the box office, and it has met with complete success. It introduces a rollicking, jolly comedian in the person of Otis Harlan—a fellow with a rattle-brained facility for saying and doing things that would disturb any man's dignity and drive care far away. Harlan is a good singer, and his rich mellow voice aids him in making the character a success. His speech of a man far gone in Anglomania is one of the funniest things ever introduced in comedy. Next to him in favor comes William Devere, whose portrayal of a jolly Arizona editor, ready for anything from heading a "lynching bee" to making love, and at home with a gun and "red ink," is a quaint character. OTIS HARLAN

St. Henry, who plays the "Queen of Burlesque," will be seen here for the first time in a Hoyt comedy. It is one of Mr. Hoyt's happy faculties to secure pretty girls in all his companies, and "A Black sheep" is no exception. Everybody will remember that quaint little comedian Otis Harlan in the character of "Hot Stuff." This time he will be funnier than ever. A Black Sheep comes to the Lansing Theatre next Wednesday evening January 27 at regular house prices. Seats on sale Monday morning 10 a. m. Prices $1.75, 50 and 25 cents. Secure your seats early.

It is two o'clock in the afternoon. The last bell is just ringing as the Instructor of English walks into the class room with a large bundle of essays under his arm. He looks around the room as he enters, chews his mustache, tosses the essays on the desk and drops into his chair. He looks around once more. All is quiet. He tips back his chair and slowly taking a little red covered book out of his vest pocket reads: "The last fortnightly due January 19th" and just as slowly replaces the little innocent red book. The class now is accustomed to this little red book but on the first of the year there was breath, less suspense when it was first flourished and a sigh of relief at its disappearance. The Professor glances at the ceiling pulls down his vest, and all listen attentively for what is to come.

"I suppose your sonnets are well under way. That closes the work for this semester with the exception of the daily themes for next week. Of course you understand there will be no final examination in this course. There will be no daily themes during the week of examinations. And you have until the middle of February to complete the outline for your novel which will be the work for the next half year.

The receipt for the sonnet had been given several weeks before it was due, as much time and deep thought were to be expended on it.

A shuffle of papers on the desk, another twirl of the mustache and the strained attention of the class once more.

"We all get careless in little things and it becomes necessary to freshen up our memory on some of the first principles of grammar. I want to read to you today some of the daily themes in which there are some striking examples of ambiguity."

"A man and his wife entered the store. He closed the door and she stood up beside him."

"And in addition to my bump of consciousness that I received when I threw myself over the horse after the ball. I got it too."

Several more were read and then the class was curtly dismissed. All took a good long breath and passed out into the hall.
