GLUBS.

"Although there is ample room for further improvement, it is still evident in many ways that women as a class are beginning to find it possible to assume an impersonal attitude toward any subject under discussion. In the matter of a blackball at a woman's club, for example, there is no longer the same horror and sensitiveness of it, and it is used much more frequently than formerly.

It is interesting, in this connection, to note the different point of view from which a blackball in a woman's club is regarded from that of the same action taken by a man's club. In the latter the casting of the blackball is a far more significant action. In a woman's club it means, as a rule, merely that that candidate will not contribute to the welfare of that particular club. The policy of women's clubs is a radically different one from the other. An entirely charming and irreproachable woman may find herself rejected in one club, while in another she will be elected by acclamation, perhaps, and received with open arms.

It is, indeed, an evidence of a growing breadth of character among women that the blackball is used with the judicious care that it is. A loyal club woman will blackball her dearest friend, sometimes, in the interests of her organization, fearing that some pet hobby or tendency of the candidate may obtrude itself upon the club, to the club's detriment. This is as it should be. It is this growing sense of personal responsibility and of organization loyalty, rather than individual preference, which is adding to the power of club development."

Mrs. Henrolin contributes an article on "The General Federation Meetings," in which she reviews the work of that organization from the first Biennial held in Chicago in May 1892, till the present time. She briefly sketches the development of the club movement from a purely literary basis till now it includes economic, philanthropic and educational phases in its work. She writes:

"To sum it up, I would say that the first Biennial of '92, was marked by organization; the second of '94, by the movement of State federation; the third of '96, by education; the fourth of '98, by the co-ordination or, in other words, the raising of the standard of the average life, and the effort to bring into it not any one thing, but all the things which go to make up well-being and harmony—in a word to demonstrate the unity of life. The General Federation stands for reciprocity, and reciprocity means giving and receiving."

Margaret Hamilton Welch gives some general information in regard to the Denver Biennial with the pictures and short sketches of the ladies prominent in its management. "The first duty of each State delegation, after the Biennial shall have convened, will be the election of a member to represent it upon the nominating committee. This committee will then meet and prepare a list of officers and directors for election. It may be seen, therefore, that to obtain the nomination requires more than local fame or sectional indorsement."

The following paragraph in reference to the D. A. R. which closes the department, shows that the patriotism of that body is not merely a matter of sentiment:

"The Daughters of the American Revolution may differ widely in opinion when it comes to the election of a president-general, but there is no uncertainty in their unity in patriotic service. They are now organizing a sanitary corps, to be offered to the nation in case of war. The entire expense of the operation of the corps will be defrayed by the society. A circular is on its rounds to the various chapters for signature, a choice of two forms of service, one more comprehensive than the other, to be accepted
