their smart togs, with a stunning color on their cheeks that healthful exercise alone can give. It is safe to predict that this is one fad at least that has come to stay.

Spring hats seem scarcely apropos of sleet and snow and true winter weather, yet they are here. I inspected a whole batch of them the other day as they came out of their foreign cases.

There is nothing startling new about them as yet.

Turbans are much in evidence; osprey is to be in vogue again. Vivid colorings will be much worn if one follows the French models, and all the small bonnets and some of the large hats have the long strings of mull, chiffon or ribbon.

Now that it has at last become bad form to wear a hat except at day functions, woman's interest in being bien coiffee is constantly on the increase. I suppose this is why I have been continually of late receiving communications as to what is the smartest way of doing the hair, and who is the cleverest coiffeur to do it.

In a general reply to all such queries, I should say that Simonson, who has the hair shop at Broadway and 21st streets, knows better than any one else in this country how to give the right look to a woman's head. He has any amount of different styles of arranging the hair—the Newport, the Marie Antoinette, and so on, he calls them. They are all smart in their different ways, and as for hair ornaments, if one fancies such things, they are to be found at Simonson's in all shapes and forms, butterflies, dainty combinations in gauze and marabout, all made in Paris and imported exclusively by Simonson.

I have heard—and on good authority, too—that the women in Paris and London have taken to wigs for everyday wear.

I must say that I can't quite credit that statement.

Of course the past three years or more of continuous undulations have played sad havoc with women's hair. We all know that by a sad and bitter experience; and when summer comes we have ondulees—many of us twice a day, in place of once. So wigs, all nicely dressed in perfect waves, ready to clap upon one's head at a moment's notice, would certainly be a blessing in many ways. Yet—yet—I don't think I can quite see a wig on—
