The City Improvement Society met on Thursday in the rooms of the Union Commercial parlors. Only a small representation of the membership of the society was present. Mrs. Taylor, president, in the chair. Mrs. A. B. Coffroth was elected assistant secretary. The work of the secretary is too laborious, there being so many inquiries addressed to the society, by women from other cities inquiring the kind and means of city improvement. It was thought best to have a report of the society's work and history of organization printed. Such a report would make the work of the secretary and assistant secretary easier and extend the society's influence. After some discussion in regard to the proposed change in street nomenclature by those who approved and disapproved the change the society adjourned to meet two weeks from date.

June has become a matrimonial epoch of great prominence. Sometimes the thermometer makes one rebel against tradition, but, since that is palpably useless, it behooves us to consider whether we have made the most of our opportunities. There is an ideal June wedding, and it does not take place in the city church, where it seems a mere interlude in the roar and rush of the life outside. The ideal month-of-roses wedding is realized oftener in England than in this country, but the Eno-Graves wedding, which occurred at Simsbury, Massachusetts, recently, was a living picture of what these affairs may be. The ceremony was performed in a picturesque little church, which fairly ran over with flowers. From the door a long strip of green carpet meandered across the church-yard, between the rows of century-old tombstones, out at the gate, down the street for four blocks, and then across the lawn and up the steps of the Eno house. Along this green carpet lane walked the whole bridal procession—the bride with her point-lace veil, the maids with short tulle veils and carrying "muffs" of pink roses, and the guests who came following after. There was an alfresco luncheon served at small tables under the trees, and thus were tradition and the thermometer both appeased.—Bazar.
