UNDER A GILDED DOME.

BY FLORA BULLOCK.

Iowa had what they called a state fair during the week beginning August 26th. I visited it on Monday and came home to compare. On the following Monday I found four times as large an exhibit of poultry, agricultural products, of art and textile fabrics, and equal or superior exhibits in every other line, at the Nebraska state fair; I enjoyed a season of being proud of my country. The Iowa buildings are smaller, darker and give not nearly so cheery an impression. They are built upon a hill among trees and the grounds gain in picturesque-ness. But when that tired feeling incident to seeing the sights, comes over you, the hills lose their charm.

The agricultural exhibit was amazingly small. The horticultural exhibit was good, and the proud remarks of the fruit men as they pointed out the excellencies of this apple or that plum which they had grown, showed the ambition that makes for success. But only a few plates of grapes adorned the tables, and the few peaches were the colicky, crumpled kind known to small boys. The floral exhibit was insignificant. The biggest thing about the fair was the attendance, which was a record-breaker,—and the multitude of lemonade stands. Before another year you may be sure the sellers of liquid coolness and sweetened sourness will have an "arrangement" preventing the fair authorities from displaying their liberal policy of supplying the people with ice water, free.

I did not chance upon any educational display there, nor a fish exhibit. So it was natural to wish that the big crowd might come over and see a fair as was a fair.

People who go forth from Nebraska and especially Lincoln, will find the Iowans to be, as the Rev. Rollin Lynde Hartt described them, a common-place people intent on money making. They don't seem to have time for fairs or other excitements, except as these afford advertisement for their business. Nevertheless a state that can harbor a convention of "tourists" every once in a while is not on the road to oblivion. Two weeks ago Iowa papers were full of great stories about the gathering of the wanderers at Britt, in that state. Britt was hospitable—up to a certain point, but the hoboes were deeply offended, because they put padlocks on their chicken coops—so the newspapers had it. The affair was great stuff for the papers. After nominating Dewey for president, and otherwise amusing themselves, they departed. They had been invited to come and were invited to go. And Britt got its name in the papers.

Des Moines has an East and a West, a Mason and Dixon line of unceasing warfare. For the river flows between. And the East does not love the West—the West is bigger, makes more noise, has more votes. So the East side, they tell me, is a unit, and thus accomplishes its ends against a divided West sometimes. As a result of this feud of the clans, the fine new library, which is now being built, is located down by the river in a rather uncanny district, and the new court house is to be there too. Perhaps that will tone up the old sheds and buildings in the vicinity. Why did it not occur to the library builders to divide up the library fund and build two smaller ones—so that the family quarrel would hurt neither? Here the policy of "scatteration" might be employed to advantage. But then they would have wrangled over the sharing.

Still, this house divided against itself manages to thrive. They can rebuild burned auditoriums in a night—almost—can have bridges in plenty, and more than all, they have money to spend on parks. Not only are the large outlying parks beautified by nature and by gardeners, but all through the city are scattered open squares, well supplied with trees. Ere long a new court house is to be built and the old one will be torn down, leaving a green square in the very heart of the city. The park commissioners are great land-grabbers. Greenwood park is a lovely place of two hundred acres. You can almost get lost in the woods there. Union park has about forty acres, but it is to be enlarged. Both of these are at the terminus of street car lines, and are well patronized. Band concerts are given there, and, by the way, a concert given by the Iowa state military band at Union park one Sunday afternoon was a musical treat. I have heard Des Moines spoken of as a musical center, but discovered that apparently the soul of the ordinary Sunday afternoon crowd responded most audibly to the same style of inspiration that appeals to the band concert crowds in Lincoln. A fine program of classical music was given, but the only piece encored was a trombone solo—"Down in the Deep, Deep Cellar." I leave you to imagine the rest. They did not play "The Indian War-Dance," but the trombone solo filled the bill.

Des Moines builders are therefore following a plan that will give joy to their children's children, the "lungs" of the city that is to grow. The city streets are narrow and crooked; they are cut up by street car tracks. The sidewalks are very narrow, too. A Saturday evening crowd blocks the street. The street car tracks are double, and the cars go at good speed, but there are few open cars, and the big closed ones have closed doors, opened by a mechanical arrangement when the passenger enters or leaves. Then there are "catchers" in front, and the motormen clang their bells vigorously when the cars pass. Yet every once in a while some one is killed by the cars. Civilization comes high.

Juvenis—I hear that the next novelty will be an automobile hearse.

Senex—Well, I do not know anybody that is dying to ride in one.
