DISAPPOINTMENT.

A very small, dirty boy stood near the show case in the drug store. It was a drug store not too haughty to have a candy counter near the door. On the show case at the very edge lay a small whitish irregular crystal. The boy knew it was rock-candy. He had seen some like it in one of the "great big pails" in which the fruit-stand man kept his sweets. And had not the fruit-stand man told Bill Grimes it was rock-candy, when he and Bill torn by the many possibilities in the nickel Bill had found, inquired the names of all the varieties of candy in the fruit-stand man's stock.

Alas had not Bill purchased the rock-candy—and (generous hero) "divvied up!"

The drug-store-man was looking out of the window. A little grimy hand reached over the edge of the show case and clutched the small crystal. Soon after the drug-store-man saw a very small, very dirty boy with his hands thrust deep in his pockets, go past the window with ostensible indifference. The drug store man could not see into the pocket, so he did not know that the sweaty little palm was folded tightly about the hard, whitish, crystalline temptation. Neither did he see the boy sneak into the first alley, and thrust the soiled lump into his mouth. This was well. For the drug store-man was kind hearted and had boys of his own. And the small, whitish, irregular crystal was a bit of alum.

NOSTALGIA.

The New Boy sat with his brown head down on his folded arms. The teacher pretended not to look and made the lesson "interesting." The weeping was quiet, oh very quiet. The big sailor collar of the new brown suit moved convulsively now and then. That was all. The yellow autumn sunshine streamed through the room, and laid its tender touch on the bowed head. The clear, confident voice of the Best Reader in school, shrilly sweet, was alone in the silence, except for the slow tick of the clock. And he said:

"Sweet Mother from East to West
The loveliest home and the dearest and best
Is the old brown house—"

A loud sob interrupted. Forty pairs of eyes turned toward the New Boy. The deep sobs continued.

The teacher came and put her hand on his head.

"Are you sick, Chester?"
"Y-y-Yes 'm."

"Where is the pain, dear?"

He put his hand to the base of his throat, the spot where sorrows meet.

"It's all swelled up," he lamented.

The teacher examined the place carefully.

"There certainly is a big lump there. I think you would better go home and drink some hot milk. Don't you?"

The October sunshine paled before the brightness of his countenance.

He walked out with a quick, brisk step, tho' tear courses still shone wet on his round red little cheeks.

"I hope you'll be well enough to come back tomorrow and stay all day," called the teacher encouragingly.

And he was.

HEAVEN AND EARTH.

The magazine page blurred and faded. The next thing I knew I was standing in line at the Gate of Heaven. That was, I dare say, because I had been reading Henry James concerning "The Great Good Place," and went off on the Poppy Land Limited before I got far enough to learn that it was not heaven after all, of which he so eloquently wrote. We stood in line as we stand when Grand Opera is two days away and everybody is going. I feared I had not altogether put off the flesh, for I had a bitter thought concerning the tall university student third from the gate. I felt convinced that he would reserve half a hundred of the best places. A little gray shade in front of me, quite bridled, when the student presumed to wrangle with Peter.

"He's trying to get his whole Frat in," she breathed.

SUNSET AND EVENING STAR.

It is good to stand at the end of the day and find beauty. My window looks into the west. If I look down, there is much that is beautiful. But when I look over, now and then I am vouchsafed a glimpse of glory. Last night, for him who saw, there in the west a long lake of fire, with amethyst shores and far peaceful mountains. Above their ragged summits a rosy sky that paled and paled to faintest blue, within whose place one quivering white star hung. On such a tideless sea swung out the slow barge which bore King Arthur to the realms of rest, far, and far, until only drifting clouds were left to the vision of him who watched where the "long ripple washed in the reeds by the shore."

THE PIONEERS.

There was no sound save the low lisp of the wave to the shore. A silver moon riding a wisp of cloud in the clear sky, flung a band, broad and glistening, across the river. On the further side, of the slow flood, a forest frowned down to the brink. On either side as far as the sky was the plain, sprinkled with scattering lights. On the plain too, close to the grassy shore, was a little sod house. How cheerfully its light shone from the small window. At the door a man and woman stood hand in hand. They saw the high sailing moon, the broad welcoming prairie. They heard the waters singing to the shore, and a sudden, strong breeze moving the long grasses, as a mighty purpose stirs the heart.

REMODELING THE UNIVERSE.

Now, as when Moses drove his flocks out into the wilderness, there is a great deal of beating about the bush, with the same tardiness in recognizing that the bush is burning and it is time to put off the shoes from the idle feet. There is so much talk by Harry Thurston Peck and others somewhat like him. Only somewhat, for H. T. Peck is a separate creation, and there is no other perfect, no, not one. There is much idle talk by these, and it is about women. One is not surprised when women talk about men. For how many ages have they been limited to one subject—Man and How to Please Him!

It is not strange that a set habit should assert itself even in the day of broken shackles. But that man and such a man, should condescend to a dissertation upon woman! Upon the appropriate place in the universe, of a creature he cannot deem of any considerable importance to the success of the scheme. This surprises us!

So steeped in ancestral blindness is this "piece of work," called Harry Thurston etcetera, that he forgets or ignores the fact that history cannot repeat itself, and pines for the return of the woman of the period of the ruff and busk. Alas! Woman cannot revert an' she would. The process of evolution turned inside out and working backward is very pretty, on paper, but it can never be objectively a verity. Only in the subjective, friend Peck, and not in the minds of many. To such as you, in mountain solitude of soul 'tis left to fancy.
