Plant Culture.

Mrs. Subbub was going away for the summer. She stood with her best bonnet perched on her head, a band-box in one hand and a bird-cage in the other.

"Now, John," she said to her husband just before she went out the door, "don't for mercy sake forget the plants. Take good care of them and water them every morning before you go down town."

"All right, Mary," sighed John, as he looked in despair at the rows and rows of flowerpots filled with thrifty plants, "I'll take good care of 'em."

Mrs. Subbub then bundled onto the Smith's Villa car and went to her train and was whirled away to her destination.

She was gone two months. When she arrived home one day she kissed John a resounding smack, hugged the children and kissed them all around and then happened to glance at her beloved plants. Well, she simply threw her hands up in the air like a drowning person and ejaculated: "Land sakes!"

Those plants looked like a lot of potato sprouts in the cellar in the spring-time. They were yellow and spindling and scraggly.

Mrs. Subbub grasped one of the sixty-five pots and glanced at the bottom of it. There was a cork in the little air hole at the bottom. She dropped it and picked up another one and it was fixed in the same way.

"What on earth——" began Mrs. Subbub.

"Well, what do you suppose a man wants to put water in a flowerpot for when it all runs right out the bottom?" exclaimed John in a sort of crestfallen way, as he began to realize that he had made a woeful mistake. "I tried to get corks for 'em all, but couldn't get enough, so I put some paper wads in the holes."

Well, Mrs. Subbub was just getting home after being away two months and she didn't say very much, but she thought quite a lot.—W. R. Dunroy.

Happened Right in the Family.

The cross examiner was a smart man, whose object was to disconcert the witness and discredit his testimony.

"What did you say your name was?" was the first question.

"Michael Doherty."

"Michael Doherty, eh? Now, Doherty, answer this question carefully. Are you a married man?"

"Oi think so, Oi was married."

"So you think because you got married that you are a married man, do you? Now, tell me whom you married."

"Who Oi married? I married a woman."

"Now, don't you know better than to trifle with the court? Of course you married a woman; did you ever hear of any one marrying a man?"

"Yes, moi sister did."—London Spare Moments.
