THE GOLDEN TARANTULA.

How Lieut. Gaul was Knighted.

"It was before an intricate and unromantic combination of straps and buckles had usurped the office of a certain article of female attire around which is clustered a wealth of chivalry," said the colonel, as he poured out his Scotch. "Pistols were more popular than divorce courts then, and co-respondents seldom had an opportunity to perjure themselves—like gentlemen."

The rest of us took Scotch, too, and dropped into easy attitudes. That kind of a preface means that the colonel is sure of his story.

"Life was not a dream of Oriental languor and magnificence to us youngsters, nor to the seniors, either, not by any manner of means," he continued, equally sure of his audience. "Our station was about as comfortable a spot as one need expect to find this side the great hereafter, and infinitely more monotonous than anything likely to be encountered by the worst of us in the eternal beyond. It was a land of summer—a particularly hot and dry summer—in a howling wilderness of bare, blistered prairies, coyotes, greasers and Seminole Indian niggers. The major's wife and her widowed sister were the only two ladies in the post. Both were eminently pious and eminently respectable.

"We had existed through nearly a year of it when the general commanding the God forsaken department swapped us a contract doctor for our surgeon-major, for the good of the service, as that officer's friends in Washington helped the surgeon-general to see it. In a moment of aberration the doctor brought out his pretty young wife, a lady with the figure of a goddess and a pair of brown eyes with a depth in them that suggested—well, say heaven, or something better or worse—a good deal depends upon the point of view. Within a week the garrison was at her feet, and the doctor's malady had developed from aberration to something that threatened frenzy. Either the major was sure of the lady's discretion, or thought there was safety in numbers, or else he just didn't have the heart to interfere. Anyway, he said nothing. And so matters went till spring brought a million bright blossoms to the prairies and a bevy of no less brightly arrayed visitors to the post, the sisters and the cousins and the aunts of the officers, marooned, so to speak, on a government reservation in a social and physical desert.

"The arrival of this charming collection of young women contributed but little, if at all, to the doctor's peace of mind. To be sure, his pretty wife was not so popular with the many in the fact of other attractions, but what was lacking in numbers seemed to be very fully made up in intensity. Lieutenant Gaul managed to spend in her society about all the time that he didn't have to give to sleeping, dressing or duty, and the garrison talked as only a handful of people huddled together without the pale of civilization, with no resources outside themselves, can talk. Furthermore, Gaul was precisely the sort of a fellow no man in his senses would pick for a rival. Big and straight and strong, with a head of curly yellow hair, a clear-cut, handsome face and a pair of big, boyish blue eyes, he was exactly the type to make an emotional, sentimental woman lose her head; and he was heedless and pleasure-loving
