

THE COURIER

VOL. XVIII, NO. XXVIII

LINCOLN, NEBRASKA, SATURDAY, JULY 19, 1902.

ESTABLISHED IN 1886

SNAP SHOTS OF SALT CREEK FLOOD

Glimpses Revealed by the Camera of the Deluge Which Inundated the Lowlands to the West of the City and Drove Hundreds of Residents from Their Homes

(Photo by Mr. E. H. Barbour.)

Among the hundred or more views of last week's Salt Creek flood entered for the Evening News prize photo contest, the above is the winner. The amateur artist who snapped this excellent photo is Prof. E. H. Barbour, head of the department of geology at Nebraska university. This panoramic view gives a comprehensive idea of the extent of the flood which swept over the Salt Creek bottoms last week, inundating a large residence district and spreading out into a watery expanse in places two miles wide. Mr. Barbour's picture was taken at 10 o'clock Thursday, July 10th, the morning after the flood and when the water had receded only two or three feet from its highest point. Mr. Barbour climbed the trestle work of the O street viaduct and from its top he snapped his camera toward the west, the result being a clever conception of photographic art. The prize of $2, offered by the Evening News, for the best flood picture, has been awarded to Mr. Barbour.

(Photo by M. F. Bayer.)

F street looking east from Third; taken at 7:20 o'clock the night of the flood. At that hour the water stood several feet deep in the streets.

(Photo by C. E. Hebard.)

The B. & M. freight yards, submerged the morning following the flood. Mr. Hebard stood on the O street viaduct, just west of Seventh, and directed his camera toward the south with splendid effect.

Additional snap shots of Salt Creek flood on page six.